Course description:

This graduate course focuses on the ways that global flows of capital, people and cultural products challenge established theoretical frames, and transform our analytical perspectives on a local scale. Locating transnational feminisms in a context of postcolonial relations, global capitalism, nationalism and migration, we will discuss new divisions of labour and forms of belongings, and the multiple power relations that these transnational processes create, with particular attention to their intersectional gendered, racialized, hetero-normative and classed dimensions.

The course invites PhD students, and it is also open to Master students engaged in research. It gives 7,5 ECTS Credits for active participation and a short paper, and 15 ECTS Credits for active participation and an essay.

Nira Yuval-Davis, Professor, University of East London.

Diana Mulinari, Professor, Centre for Gender Studies, Lund University.
